

Historical Background Information

Patricia and Luther Broussard left Doyfala Island thirteen years ago with three-year-old Magenta. They had married each other six months before a tragedy caused Luther to gather his new wife and flee his home with a toddler at night. He was a devoted member of the Seven Tribes of Shiloh like his father and grandfather. It had taken nearly three generations to get enough intel to bring down the St. Andrews Corporation. Finally, he was on the precipice of exposing them for raping the land, embezzling, and causing the death of an innocent person. All the evidence was to be presented the next day during a press conference. Unfortunately, Luther was double-crossed by his second in command and had to run for his life. Luther was named a person of interest in a double murder and had no choice but to leave and seek asylum in the United States. He contemplated leaving his wife behind, but her mother said he should take her with him. He, Patricia, and baby Magenta arrived safely in Miami in May of 2000. Luther was determined to return to Doyfala one day to clear his name and take down the St. Andrews family.

Consequently, he rose to popularity in politics and eventually became the mayor of Metairie, Louisiana, where the family had eventually settled. In addition, Patricia Broussard became a very influential executive at Reliant Energy. They raised Magenta and her twin sisters to be strong, proud, and informed teenagers. Magenta excelled at track and field and had an overwhelming love of all things nature. She was particularly close to her maternal grandmother and visited her on the island every summer. She wondered why her sisters never accompanied her but decided it was a special treat reserved for her.
